What gives the kitchen garden its charm and appeal is the blend of vegetables, fruit, herbs and flowers that are grown together like a living tapestry. They may be designed in geometric patterns or in a more flowing design, and are normally positioned right next to the house for convenience and to make it easy to enjoy the effect from indoors. Kitchen gardens are planted and replanted throughout the season for a continuous supply of fresh food for the kitchen.

The traditional kitchen garden, also known as a potager (from the French jardin potager) or in Scotland a kailyard, is a space separate from the rest of the residential garden – the ornamental plants and lawn areas. Most vegetable gardens are still miniature versions of old family farm plots, but the kitchen garden is different not only in its history, but also its design.

The Kitchen Garden was originally built for William III and Mary II in 1689, on the site of Henry VIII's tiltyard. The tiltyard was divided into six square, walled areas, each approximately one acre in size. When Queen Victoria came to the throne, she combined all of the royal kitchen gardens in the London palaces into one operation at Windsor Castle.

The Kitchen Gardens have had various homes over the years, but most recently they are sited to the east of the stables. This ground was originally called the Paddocks because it was where the carriage horses were turned out for a pick of grass. The greenhouses were already there, but until the early 1990s it was a dreary, featureless patch.
