The Old Iron Bridge of 1800, originally known simply as Merthyr Bridge before 1809, in Merthyr Tydfil, South Wales, was a cast-iron bridge across the River Taff.. Although an important early example of iron bridge-building and well known as a local landmark within living memory, the bridge has largely disappeared from engineering history.

Merthyr Tydfil

The town has a population of 43,820 (2011 Census). The town is often known as Merthyr. The town is said to be named after Tydfil, a daughter of King Brychan of Brycheiniog.

According to her legend, she was slain at Merthyr by pagans around 480 AD; the place was subsequently named Merthyr Tydfil in her honour.

Merthyr Tydfil - Wikipedia

Merthyr Tydfil, my home town, was a place at the heart of the Industrial Revolution when Iron was King and coal its Queen. When the town went from being a farming village to a great Iron Metropolis, a melting pot of culture. A little like the Gold Rush but in this case it was the iron works that attracted the people.
