Studies have shown that the risk of alcoholism is higher in people that have low self-control or self-regulation (Patock-Peckham et al., 2001). People that are self-regulated are able to recognize when a behavior is destructive and can change either their behavior or the environment supporting the behavior (Patock-Peckham et al., 2001).

Alcoholism from a social learning theory perspective

Past research show that alcoholics that stopped drinking on their own had higher self-efficiency compared to those that relapse (Vaillant 1995; as cited in Bandura, 2004). Those with high self-efficacy are less inclined to relapse and abuse alcohol in stressful situations (Marlatt & Gordon, 1980; as cited Florentine & Hillhouse, 2003).
